In 1974, I painted 'The Island at the Top of the World' quad illustration from a rough design created by my old boss, Eric Pulford. From web research it can be seen that his design incorporated and adapted elements from the American poster campaign. The Killer Whale poster(which I have never seen before), featuring an enlargement of the Orcas fight scene on the ice floe, appears to be a cut-out taken from my main illustration and would probably have been reproduced from a retouched colour photoprint. I cannot definitely identify the artist who painted the Viking group but I am sure it is in the style of Bill Wiggins who I worked with for twelve years. As it bears the Disney credit, some would assume that the illustration originated in America, I do not think so. A short while after the film's very successful release, I learned from one of my previous colleagues at Downtons, that Disney were so impressed with the art, that they invited Eric Pulford to America to accept an award for the quad painting.	£80.00

I didn't attend a screening of the film but was given a synopsis and some transparencies. An open brief to create an image reflecting the outrageous theme of the film. The illustration was an invitation to depart from the conventional use of colour, the client was pleased and I thought nothing more about it. On reflection, the film has been well accepted and I was surprised and amused that it seems to have achieved somewhat of a cult status."	£60.00
