The first was the 'Legs' and Bond figure, this was then sent to the client for transparencies to be made. I then continued with finishing the painting of the full width quad montage. When the legs were returned to me, I stripped the art from it's backing board and pasted it onto the full width quad art. Transparencies were then made of the complete poster. It is just possible to just detect the fine cut around the legs. Long before computers became available, stripping, cutting and pasting separate elements of artwork together was the accepted way to adapt an art montage to fit the many different poster sizes. Incidentally, I was briefed by Eric Pulford to supply the finished illustration from his original design. Bill Gold has frequently been credited with the design, but to my knowledge, his contribution was to create the photograph of the Bond figure between the legs. This image may have been commissioned for the American one sheet. He asked the model to wear her bikini pants back-to-front for a sexier look. His original concept was incorporated by Eric Pulford into the poster campaign.	£250.00

I didn't attend a screening of the film but was given a synopsis and some transparencies. An open brief to create an image reflecting the outrageous theme of the film. The illustration was an invitation to depart from the conventional use of colour, the client was pleased and I thought nothing more about it. On reflection, the film has been well accepted and I was surprised and amused that it seems to have achieved somewhat of a cult status.	£70.00
